MileStone 4: Exercise More

Once again I set out to do more than I had time for. Although firebase was a lot easier to work with, connecting a backend database is challenging. I followed a lot of the notes from class to build this project. It was good to implement many aspects of lab into one project, but following the notes too close caused me to hit a major hurdle. Since I decided to structure my data a little differently, that reflect on how the code read int data from firebase to my table. Since I needed each key to be different I decided to use auto ID's that were randomly generated. This caused me to have to call these entries by the parent not the children. I named the parent, but I forgot to reference it in viewdidload().

Something I wish I had more time for was the design/look of the app. I know I can do a better job at making this app more aesthetically pleasing. I think the whole app can look more professional, and beautiful.

If I keep working on this app I know I can make it good enough to publish in the apps store. I need to work on all features a discussed in the first milestone, and then It will be as functionable as I want it to be. I think the options to enter in data need to be worked on, and the look and feel of the table. With this many iterations I hope the next one will be a finished product for the app store.
